Micromechanical pressure transducers have been successfully developed to the point of sufficiently good performance that they can be used to measure pressure in a fluid at a remote location. They are used, for example, in a liquid fuel injector. In fuel injectors, it is important to be able to measure the pressure in the fuel being injected, for two reasons. One reason is to ensure that adequate fuel is being injected. Another reason is that, as the fuel increases in temperature, there is a risk that the fuel will become unstable and deposit as a thin film on the surfaces of a closed-loop fuel system. This could prevent adequate fuel flow and lead to the described disadvantages. A micromechanical pressure transducer could be used to measure the pressure of the fuel and provide an alarm when this exceeds a predetermined value. In the past, such transducers have had to be protected in some way from the environment of the system. For example, they have been encapsulated in a hermetically-sealed housing with a membrane that is permeable to the gases of the fuel. For fuel cells in which the fuel is hydrogen, this has meant that the transducer must be in a separate packaging from the fuel cell components. However, this increases costs and reduces the reliability of such systems. Also, such a packaging is not suitable for applications that
