The influence of poverty and stress on hospitalization outcomes. Poor health is one of the most consistent correlates of heightened healthcare utilization. This study examines the effects of poverty and stress on hospitalization outcomes including functional status, mortality, and length of stay in adult acute care hospitals in the United States. We analyzed data from the 2003 Healthcare Cost and Utilization Project on the frequency of 30-day hospital stays among adults by poverty status and by stress level. We used logistic regression models for mortality and multiple linear regression models for length of stay to examine the relationship between poverty and stress and mortality, respectively. We used logistic regression for functional status, counting as 'good' a score  $\geq 75$  on the 30-day Katz ADL Scale. Poor income status, concentration of poverty, and high stress were all related to a higher probability of mortality, longer length of stay, and lower functional status. In multivariate models controlling for potential confounders including age, race, and comorbidities, the concentration of poverty and stress level were associated with mortality, functional status, and length of stay. The concentration of poverty was associated with an increased probability of mortality and length of stay; the high stress level was associated with a lower functional status and an increased length of stay. Our study results underscore the importance of addressing not only health insurance coverage but also the social determinants of health in reducing hospitalization burden in low-income populations.
