the servers and sending the data to a text console or a web page. I've had some looks at the problem and what I've come up with is an energy monitor for servers, but I don't have any sources to back up my claims. Instead of getting into all the gory details here's a link to my website:

Thus far, the few reviews of this game that I have seen have been positive, and praise the game for its story and setting. The story is engaging, if a bit typical for the genre, although the highlights are enough to keep me interested. It remains to be seen how the game will deal with the tenuous realism around VR experience, which adds a healthy dose of strangeness. ... [W]hen put together, the areas look beautiful, from the well-constructed indoor areas to the outer world, which has slightly varied designs. The player is generally made to look like a real human being, with a few exceptions, but a number of characters and NPCs in the game have facial features that are easily traced back to actors in real life, while one female NPC looks very strongly like a real-life celebrity. You may have a difficult time figuring out the details as to why she's acting like she is, but it makes for a rather strange juxtaposition between the realism of the NPCs and the fantasy setting. A good deal of the combat looks good, and, just like Skyrim, enemies are going to be rushing at the player. – Amazon Review of the game by Dranoch, who is currently testing the game and getting to know it a little more. 1. Field of the Invention The invention relates generally to imaging formation responses to chemical and/or physical trauma and more particularly to in situ imaging of the formation surrounding a well borehole. 2. Background Art In the past, in-situ drilling of a well borehole involved blasting and/or irrigation of the subsurface formations with a fluid or foam slurry. A well borehole was drilled, connected to a producing well, and then foam was deployed down the well borehole at a predetermined rate until the desired level of stimulation was reached. In order to determine if the desired level of stimulation had been reached, the fluid that had been pumped into the formation was acidified prior to acid stimulation and then fluids well known in the art were collected and the acidity of the fluid measured to see whether the desired stimulation had taken place. When well boreholes
